Supplement Company Secrets: What They Don't Want You To Know!

Knowledge is power...

My e-book, "Fat Loss Revealed," contains detailed information on a large number of supplement ingredients — both the science and the doses are covered. That way, you can look at the label and see for yourself if a supplement will live up to its claims.

Introduction

How many times have you seen ads for some supplement that claimed it was "natural" or "doctor-recommended" or "clinically proven," only to try it and find it didn't work? That's the experience of millions of people year after year. This report will attempt to cover the most common and misleading marketing terms you will see in ads or find on web sites.

Part I focuses on misleading marketing terms the supplement industry regularly uses to separate you from your money. You will recognize most of them I am sure, and after reading the section, should recognize them for the scam they are.

Part II covers a marketing strategy that is not found in ads as such, but appears on the label of many supplements and causes endless confusion for buyers. You won't be fooled by it again...hopefully.

play a big part of the effectiveness of a supp. Many ads discuss the merits of their supplement ingredients in glowing terms, but fail to disclose the amounts. Dose is important too—it's a point my mods and I make when we review supplements on my private forums. Think about it this way: if you had a headache, would you take two aspirin...or 1/4 of one tablet? After all, the ingredients are the same...right?

Part I

The supplement industry, like all industries, is so full of confusing marketing terms designed to baffle people with BS, that it's hard to make informed decisions as to what to buy or which companies to trust. It's confusing as hell for the average buyer. Never fear, Will Brink is here! In the following pages, we will explore and/or explain some of the most common marketing terms designed to part you from your money, thus helping you make more informed decisions.

The standard fare of slick marketing terms is all too common in the advertising campaigns of unscrupulous supplement companies, and frankly, they drive me nuts! I start foaming at the mouth with irritation when I see these tactics used to sell products to people. After a decade of trying to inform and educate people, I often feel I am getting no closer to my goals of helping them make better decisions regarding the supplements they spend their hard-earned money on. What follows are some of the most common marketing terms and what they actually mean to you, the buyer. Hopefully you will see them for what they really are, and think more carefully about the supps by supplement labels using chemical names for their ingredients rather than common names. For example, seeing "2-aminoglutaramic acid" on a label looks more high-tech and impressive than "L-glutamine" (an amino acid), even though they're exactly the same. This is a trick my moderators have spotted several times when reviewing different supplement formulas.

Commonly Used Marketing Terms:

"Clinically proven" Whenever I hear this term I want to call the company up and ask "which clinic and where is it located?" This term means absolutely nothing to the average buyer. What the term is insinuating, of course, is that the product has been in clinical use for some time and has been found to be effective in a clinical setting, but it's rarely—if ever—true.

"Patented" This one of the most powerful of the misleading marketing terms used in the industry. People assume that a patent means the United States Patent and Trademark Office has evaluated a product and found it to be so effective, it's deserving of a patent. That is simply not the case. The granting of a patent (and there are several forms of patents, but that's beyond the scope of this discussion) means the company has an exclusive right to sell the product for the length of the patent, and they have convinced the US Patent office that the idea, or formula, etc., is original enough to grant a patent. It does not mean — in any way — that the product or idea is effective for its intended claim or use, or that it is backed up by legitimate research.

One would hope the product was backed up by legitimate research and that’s why the patent office granted the patent, but it’s often not the case. A patent simply protects a company’s legal/financial/intellectual interests — it’s not a guarantee that the product is effective per se. Translated, this means that there are some really silly patents out there that have virtually nothing to do with a product’s effectiveness. A quick perusal of the patent office web page at www.uspto.gov can be fun. Patents are important and very useful for a company or individual to legally protect their concept or product so others can’t simply copy it, but it has little to do with efficacy of the product in question. It may be a great product with a patent or it may be a really crappy product with a patent.

Botanical names... are also frequently used to promote supplements in advertisements. “Avena sativa,” for example, sounds much more exotic and scientific than “oats,” although that’s exactly what it is. My moderators do a great job of deciphering confusing terms for the members of my forums.

“Doctor recommended” Like “clinically proven,” I always want to call the company up and ask “which doctor is that and can I have his or her phone number?” Somehow I know they won’t have a doctor for me to talk to. And what type of doctor are they talking about? A medical doctor (MD), or a person with a Ph.D. (also a doctor) in a totally unrelated field? Do I care if a person with a Ph.D. in French History recommends the product? Of course not! Also, does this doctor — or doctors — listed in their ad have financial interests in recommending the product or is he doing it out of the goodness of his heart? The reality is that most MD’s have very little knowledge of nutrition or nutritional supplements anyway. Bottom line, 99% of the time, “Doctor recommended” is a worthless term with no bearing on the effectiveness, quality, or safety of a product, so don’t fall for it.

Many of the questions the mods and I get on the forums concern brand name supplements. There are thousands of different brands available over the counter and online. We now have over 200 reviews of brand name supplements, with more being added each week.

“All natural” I just hate this term! It means nothing at all, yet people seem to fall for it virtually every time. Flying is not “natural” to humans, yet we do it all the time. Uranium is natural, do you want to eat the stuff? Of course not! It's an irrelevant, ambiguous term. Ignore it.

“Scientifically formulated” As opposed to what, unscientifically formulated?! Designed by monkeys working on a computer? One would hope the product in question was formulated with some scientific grounding in mind, but this is rarely the case, sad to say. Many products are designed with their marketing power in mind, not their scientific strengths, which leads us to our next term:

“Research proven” If the company has funded legitimate studies at an independent location and the study was published in a peer-reviewed journal somewhere, great! I applaud that company, as I have lamented about the number of companies that refuse to pay for research to support their own products for many years. The sad fact is, very few companies spend money on real research, preferring instead to spend money on marketing. If the company has some real research to back up the claim of “research proven,” they should have no problem supplying that information right? Wrong. My calls to many companies either yielded a mish-mash of junk science or nothing at all. One guy said to me “hey man, it’s a marketing term” and quickly got off the phone.

You would not believe what passes for “research” with some companies. The real harm here is that good companies that do shell out the money for real research have to compete with companies that simply pretend to. That can put the good companies at a real disadvantage, not to mention it fools people into buying a product with no research at all behind it.

“Used for thousands of years...” Last, but not least, is this gem of a marketing term. So if the product has only been used for 300 years, is it no good? People have also been eating things like tiger penis for thousands of years, does that mean it works or is safe? The answer is (drum roll)...No!

Of course, at one time the earth was considered flat, and it was once believed the sun revolved around the earth — but times change. Sure, if an herb has been used for a few thousand years, such as ephedra (Ma Huang), this lends some legitimacy to claims for its safety and effectiveness, but it’s far from proof. The bottom line here is that people have been using all sorts of things for thousands of years, some good, some not so good, some safe, some not so safe. The term should not drive anyone to buy a product and assume that — because it’s been used for a thousand years (and

Well there you have it: my down-and-dirty guide to the world of marketing terms employed by some companies to sell products. Can you think of others you would like explained? Contact me and I will see if it's yet another BS marketing term worth exposing. As I alluded to above, these marketing tactics harm the legitimate companies out there trying to sell you a high-quality, effective product by confusing the buyer who buys into the outlandish claims. Are there more misleading tactics out there? Yes, and one of the major tactics is covered in Part II below.

The next time you hear or see an ad that says their product is “clinically proven, doctor recommended, all natural, scientifically formulated, and patented,” don’t assume it’s any of those things or that any of them tell you anything about the effectiveness of the product.

there are links to a variety of online supplement retailers, along with feedback from users. Shopping online is typically less expensive than over-the-counter retail, and in many cases, it's possible to view label information...so it's easier to make comparisons between different supplement brands.

Part II

In Part I, I covered well-known marketing terms seen in many supplement advertisements. However, one term I didn't cover, was "proprietary blend" which in many cases is the most potentially misleading term of them all, though not a term always seen in ads per se, but on the side of the bottle.

I felt it was a topic that should be covered separately, as it does not fit under the classic definition of a commonly-used marketing term found in ads. It's a more complicated subject—thus, much more space is required to explain it.

Proprietary blends are not inherently a negative for the consumer, though they are inherently confusing in most cases.

A "proprietary blend" might be listed on a supplement label for one of two reasons:

- to prevent the competition from knowing exactly what ratios and amounts of each ingredient are present in the formula, in order to prevent them from copying their formula exactly (commonly referred to as a "knock off"); or

TERMS, TERMS, TERMS

Supplement Company Secrets: What They Don't Want You To Know!

It's not unusual... for health and fitness conscious people to take a range of different supplements. My e-books offer guidance on how to prioritize your supplements, so you get the most "bang for your buck."

- to hide the fact the formula contains very little of the active ingredients listed on the bottle in an attempt to fool consumers.

Sadly, the latter use is far more common than the former. They see a long list of seemingly impressive ingredients listed in the "proprietary blend" none of which are there in amounts that will have any effects. This is commonly referred to as "label decoration" by industry insiders. Thus the first use of the term is a legitimate way for a company making a quality supplement from having the competition copy or "knock off" their formula and the second use is to scam people.

So how does the consumer tell the difference?

They can't, or at least they can't without some research and knowledge, which the scam artists know few people have the time and energy to dedicate to finding the answers. Although there are a few tips the consumer can use to decide if a product with a "proprietary blend" is worth trying, no one, not even me, can figure out exactly how much of each ingredient is in the blend or in what ratio of each is contained within the formula, hence why the honest and not-so-honest companies employ "proprietary blends" so often.

Thus, we have something of a conundrum here and conflict between a company making a quality formula attempting to protect that formula from other companies vs. the company simply looking to baffle buyers with BS.

Supplement Company Secrets: What They Don't Want You To Know!

Take the K.I.S.S... approach to supplements: in my e-books and on the forums, I advise people to avoid creating complex supplement stacks. When you add too many variables at one time, you can't tell what's working and what isn't. You may be wasting a lot of money on unnecessary supplements.

There are at least some basic tips or food for thought here regarding this problem. A formula that contains — say — 10 ingredients in a “proprietary blend” is by no means de facto superior then one with three ingredients in it. It's the dose that matters. Clearly, it's better to have higher amounts of ingredients that will have some effects vs. a long list of ingredients in doses too low to have any effects.

Some times it helps to look at both what's in the blend and how much of the blend actually exists. As an example, if say the blend is 300 mg total and contains ten ingredients, that's only 30 mg per ingredient, assuming (and you know what they say about assuming!) that each is found in equal amounts. Clearly, for most compounds out there, 30 mg won't do jack sh*&.

On the other hand, if say the blend is 3000 mg (3 grams) and contains three or four ingredients, there is at least a better chance that the formula contains enough of each (and remember, we can't tell how much of each is in there as that information is “proprietary”) to have some effects you are looking for such as an increase in strength, or a decrease in body fat, etc.

Unfortunately, the above examples are so vague as to be close to worthless as it's easy enough to formulate a 3000 mg blend where all the ingredients are worthless to begin with or a 300 mg blend that contains compounds that only require small doses to have an effect and or can be toxic at higher doses.

For example, the mineral zinc tends to be no more than 30 mg in most formulas and no more is needed or recommended. Much of this comes down to the consumer knowing what the various ingredients are and how they work (to decide if they are even worth using in the first place) then deciding if said blend appears to at least contain a dose that would have the desired effects, which just brings us back to my prior comment: most people have neither the time or inclination to research all that info just to decide if they want to use a product and thus the many “proprietary blends” on the market that are no more than a long list of underdosed ingredients.

Wish I could be of more help giving specific advice to readers of this section as to what makes a good blend and what constitutes a poorly made blend, but the above advice is the best I can do under the circumstances. Although a “proprietary blend” is not by default a negative to the consumer, it is by all means the poster child for the well-known Latin term “Caveat Emptor,” which translates into English as “let the buyer beware”.

The above gives the reader a good idea of just how confusing and misleading supplement marketing can be, which makes it very difficult to make educated choices. To explain every supplement on the market would take an entire book, which, by no coincidence, I
